I'm thinking of implementing web based image processing application to showcase my job portfolio. The application will be web-based and store the images locally within a database. The client is already using Joomla! and would like the application to be as easy to administer as possible. So I was thinking of setting up a site in a similar way and the idea is that the frontend will contain an HTML/CSS and the backend will be in Java. Java will be connected to the database and that will be used to show the uploaded images. I've already made some tests with Adobe Dreamweaver and the Joomla! module, however I would like to get a recommendation from you guys if I'm heading the right direction or not. A: Yes, you can. Typically this is done in a few ways: Your frontend system 'contains' your frontend Joomla! site and you keep the site's editing separate from the back-end system (which you would make a Java application) Your frontend site is completely separate and a client of some sort (or a Java application) communicates with the back-end. Point 1 is typically the easiest solution. It gives you greater control over your front-end system and the back-end system is simply a client that you have to manage. A reverse proxy server, such as Apache, can be used to intercede between the front-end and back-end. It will make your Joomla! installation 'visible' to the client and then work with your back-end. It would be configured (at minimum) to forward all requests for the Joomla! installation (so it can see the pages etc.) to your back-end Java application. Point 2 is a bit more complicated. You are dependent on a client to do something. This can be
